

From CEC Section 94910, School Performance Fact Sheet:

1. a. See Appendix 1 (Completion Rates)

1. b See Appendix 2 (Placement Rates)

1. c As our programs make no claim of preparing students to pass licensing exams, the reporting of licensing exam pass rates does not apply to us.

1. d Neither the college nor any representative of the college makes any express or implied claim about the salary that may be earned after completing the educational program. Consequently, we have included no salary or wage information.

2. e. Neither our writing programs nor our counseling program (which we no longer offer, since October 2011) are designed to lead to a specific profession. Instead, they provide skills that are useful in many areas and adaptable to a wide variety of occupations. For example, one of our graduates teaches counseling at a community college. She is an adjunct but might be hired full time at $60,000 per year. A Creative Writing graduate teaches high school English, in Arizona, for around $30,000 per year. Others of our students set their sights on freelance writing, which pays anywhere from nothing to millions per book.

Because of the variety of careers backgrounds in writing and counseling allow, we are presuming this question applies to institutions more pointedly vocational and does not apply to us.

2. f. (1). Our administrator keeps a roster of student matriculation dates, passing dates for each class, and graduation dates, as well as other data. Should a reader of this document care to review this roster, we will make it available upon request, with student personal information deleted. The placement data for graduates is also collected through surveys and kept on file. Summaries of this information can also be provided upon request.

2. f. (2) and (3) We provide a link on our website to the Authors, Writers, and Editors section of the U.S. Department of Labor Occupational Outlook Handbook, which gives the most thorough and current data available on job prospects for graduates of writing programs. We no longer provide such a link to the section regarding counseling, as we no longer offer the counseling program. To access the link, go to:
